have fixed most of the problems. The result is one of the greatest concert films ever made.

The first half of the film, showcasing the first night, is the best. The church (a converted movie theater in Watts) is only partially-filled, yet the attendees are passionate and there are no distractions from the performance. Ms. Franklin sings and plays piano on a couple of the hymns, but she's backed by the Reverend James Cleveland (a mighty force in his own right), and The Southern California Community Choir, directed by Alexander Hamilton (yes, that's his real name). The audience yells and cheers in response to Franklin's vocal renditions of "What a Friend We Have in Jesus," Marvin Gaye's "Wholy Holy," and even her own interpretation of Carole King's "You've Got a Friend." Sweat beads on Franklin's face from the exertion (and presumably heat from all the lights), but she's in her element, with a vocal range that had my jaw agape several times.

The second night of recording, though still filled with amazing music, is less carefree. Word had clearly spread and the church was filled to capacity (with onlookers including The Rolling Stones' Mick Jagger and Charlie Watts). In addition, Franklin's own father, the Reverend C.L. Franklin, is in attendance, sitting in the front row. His is an almost overwhelming presence, and when the music is paused for him to go to the lectern and speak, I groaned. It's not that his speech is long, it's just that it takes away from the chance to hear his gifted daughter sing, and she seems less free and more restrained in his presence (he was a towering figure so it's not hard to see why).

Despite this, "Amazing Grace" is mesmerizing. It's not just the congregants who are in Ms. Franklin's spell. You can see the film technicians, cameramen, and director Pollack himself in the background from time to time, and there are moments when they themselves stop and gape in wonder at Franklin's talent and the spirit and joy pervading the atmosphere. It's tragic that Pollack did not live long enough to see this project completed, but it's a tribute to his skills that the raw footage so effectively captured the voice and passion of one of the greatest singers in modern times.
