FCW Pond Study Group Urges Care Of Ponds To Minimize Algal Growth

by Barbara Cotnam

In November 2018, the Friends of Chatham Waterways (FCW) completed its first year of assessing five kettle ponds in Chatham for cyanobacteria. FCW funded the program and our volunteers worked following guidelines formulated by the Association to Preserve Cape Cod. The town of Chatham purchased equipment for the study, selected by Natural Resources Director Robert Duncanson.

Cyanobacteria, often called blue-green algae, are a group of aquatic microbes that when certain conditions occur can multiply rapidly and release toxins into the water, which present a health hazard to pets and humans.

The good news is that the study found that most of the ponds had only low levels of a non-toxic algae which bloomed sporadically. However, one pond, White Pond, showed a significant number of samples of water which contained a more toxic genus of algae, but the concentration only exceeded pet safety guidelines 14 percent of the time and recreational guidelines only once.

Listed below are simple actions Chatham residents who live abutting a water body can take to help improve water quality. Note: FCW recommends that all residents and second home owners follow these guidelines to prevent algal blooms.

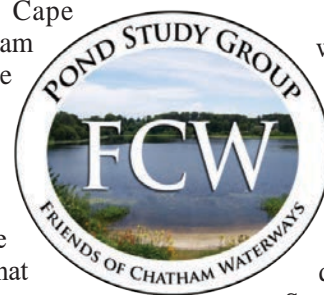

1. Do not feed wildlife or waterfowl around ponds. If you know of someone who feeds seagulls, or any waterfowl, please inform them that it attracts groups of birds that pollute the water.

2. Chatham fertilizer regulations prohibit use of fertilizer within 100 feet of a pond.

3. Create a 20-foot or wider buffer zone of native plants abutting the shore line. Native plant material recommendations: For shady sites, Pennsylvania sedge, a low growing ornamental grass, and hydrangea quercifolia "Pee Wee." For Sunny sites, prairie dropsied and short ornamental grass. Or perennials like coreopsis and cone flower and shrubs such as aronia, low-growing blueberry shrubs, clethra "sugartina," "vanilla spice" or "ruby spice."

4. Remove fallen limbs, debris and sludge from edge of your pond.

FCW was pleased to receive a grant of $1,000 in December 2018, from The Chatham Fund of The Cape Cod Foundation. This grant helps fund continuation of this important program in 2019. The Chatham Natural Resources Department will again help this season with lab fees. FCW is being pro-active to I.D. potential cyanobacteria problem areas in five of Chatham's kettle ponds. We thank both agencies for their support.
