favorite,” he said. “What I think is wonderful, a lot of people don’t and vice versa.”

That said, Pessoni has a soft spot for those that most closely resemble traditional daylilies.

“Through hybridizing they’ve become ruffled and doubled and spidered. A lot of them don’t even look like daylilies anymore,” he said.

Pessoni now has 800 daylilies and his garden is also a nationally registered Hemerocallis display garden. But there’s a catch. When it comes to having a registered garden, the American Hemerocallis Society wants current daylily varieties. That had Pessoni wondering how to accommodate that requirement. He decided a sale was in order.

“One Sunday night on the way back to Connecticut we put a sign out on Tonset Road that said, ‘daylily tag sale next Saturday,’” said Pessoni, who noted that he didn’t think it would generate much, if any attention. “At 6 a.m. the following Saturday morning we had three cars waiting.”

To remain current, Pessoni sells up 50 of his older lily plants and adds 50 current plants. Pessoni said the lilies are classified through their registration date, which is what makes them either old or current.

“There are 78,000 registered daylilies because they’re very easy to hybridize,” he said.

Through the years, Pessoni’s lily sale has only increased, with other plants added to the mix. Pessoni’s front yard filled up with lilies, arranged in an easily navigable maze to welcome visitors. There was concern as to what to plant in the shadier areas not as suitable for flowers.

It all comes back to the lilies, which began as a hobby, inspired by the iris garden of a family friend.

“Daylily people don’t know what to do in the shade, so consequently we figured we’d buy a few Hosta,” said Pessoni.

Hydrangeas were also planted in several spots, primarily in the back yard, and it didn’t take long for Pessoni, a member of the Cape Cod Hydrangea Society, to become part of the Cape’s annual Hydrangea Festival and subsequent tours.

Today, along with the daylilies, Pessoni’s yard boasts more than 350 varieties of Hosta, everything from large leaf to miniature, a vibrant collection of hydrangeas, and a vegetable garden that would make some commercial farms envious.

Visitors to Pessoni’s home during blooming months will likely find him somewhere among the plants, a clipboard in hand as he checks his flowers, makes notes, and decides what he’ll offer for sale.

Much of the work he does with regard to his gardens involves maintenance, such as deadheading flowers, transplanting, and the seemingly never-ending task of weeding, although deadheading can also be time consuming. Last year the couple counted more than 1,800 deadheads.

While Linda lends a hand with the deadheading, Pessoni is fortunate to have assistance with weeding from a summer resident of Orleans, ironically named Lily, and is immensely grateful for the help.

The big question on the minds of those who have seen Pessoni’s spectacular yard is how he manages to be successful with so many plants.

“There’s an old saying, basically about any plant: You buy the plant. You plant the plant, and then you water, water, water, water, water,” he said. “This has been an absolutely incredible year I think because it was a cool spring with a lot of rain. Everything is much better than it ever has been.”

Hybridizing has resulted in a wide array of lily types, everything from ruffles and fringes, to spidery petals and a rainbow of colors.

The soil base beneath the plants is also important. Since Cape Cod is notorious for its sandy soil, Pessoni put down a layer of richer soil, and also added composted materials from the local transfer station.

“The compost at the dump is really good,” he said.

Bugs, he added, aren’t really a problem.

“Daylilies are great because nothing touches them. No bugs. Bees don’t like them. Occasionally you’ll see an earwig, and every once in a while, you’ll find a tree frog sitting in the flower,” he said.

Rabbits, on the other hand, are Pessoni’s nemesis. The furry creatures enjoy nibbling on the spiky first leaves of the Hosta plants, and have wreaked havoc in Pessoni’s vegetable garden, in which he grows a little bit of everything, from carrots to peppers, as well as beautiful basil.

While Rabbits are a challenge, people are less so. Pessoni enjoys visitors, joking that their praise of his handiwork is going to give him a big head to go along with his green thumbs. But that’s OK with him.

“One of the nicest things about the garden is the people that come,” he said. “Ninety-nine out of a hundred people are very happy, love the garden. One in a hundred are miserable, but some people aren’t happy unless they’re unhappy.”

Will there ever come a day when the lilies are no more? Only when Pessoni stops enjoying it so much.

“Everybody that walks around says, ‘Man, what a lot of work.’ The minute that I consider it work is the time it’ll stop,” Pessoni said. “You can’t maintain what I do if it’s a job. I love what I do. I get a lot of joy out of flowers.”

turns by themselves. They have the wonderful backing of Bob Wilder on keyboards, Evan Eldredge on drums, and Justin Torrellas on reeds. Wilder also directed the play. Suzette Hutchinson, who has tons of impressive dance credentials, choreographed the showy presentations that the Wonderettes make both for their prom and their reunion, and she’s also the stage manager. “It’s light and summery,” she said on her way to calling “10 minutes” to curtain time to the cast.

The four women and three men have the stage for the whole performance, and if any one is tired, they never let it show.

Archer writes in her bio that with her role as Betty Jean she now shares the name Betty with her great-grandmother. Cloutier thanks her family and “amazing coworkers and patients who put up with this crazy, singing, and dancing nurse, mother, wife, and friend,” Mayer writes that she is “thrilled to wear her cat-eye glasses once again!” And Wiseman, a recent graduate of Barnstable High School, will be attending American University in Washington, D.C. in the fall.

It’s pretty much about the music, although the prom scene includes of course some teen angst and the reunion some of the same among young adults. All of it stays light-hearted, a midsummer night’s dream of crushes and first real loves, and a ring, and a baby on the way, but always to music that many will remember and many others may love to hear for the first time.

One exception: the song many of us know as “You Don’t Own Me” gets a fresh take when three of the women admonish a man by singing “You Don’t Own Her.” It’s the most serious statement the play makes, and in our era—50 years later!—when men, including many of them in power, still boast about grabbing women, it feels like an anthem.
