

Greenland

where we were greeted with breathtaking views of glaciers floating by our window.

Ilulissat is built on the edge of the ocean and is known for buildings that are whimsically painted in colorful shades of the rainbow. There are no roads between towns in Greenland. If you are traveling by land, once you hit the edge of a settlement it's either dogsled or snowmobile.

When we arrived, the harbor had been frozen for seven days with ships locked in and the fishermen unable to go out. Staring out the window of our hotel we spotted a lone dog sled floating by on a block of broken sea ice. By the next morning, both the dog sled and the ice had disappeared.

On our first day in Ilulissat we poked around the snowy streets and visited an arts workshop where we watched native artists sculpting reindeer horn into jewelry and into "tupilak" figures, which are believed to carry an ancestor's spirit. The next day, we hiked into the stark beauty of the Icefjord World Heritage Site with panoramic views of massive icebergs. Our friendly guide Ronni brought us to the remains of Sermermiut, an abandoned Inuit settlement reaching back 4,000 years. Later that night we lived out our dream, snowshoeing under the Northern Lights. It was the only night that week they were visible, but they were so intense that we got to see them again right outside of our hotel as they danced across the sky.

On day three we prepared for our five-hour dogsled ride into the interior. Riding in a dogsled feels like a cross between a toboggan and a roller coaster. With a dozen dogs running at full speed in front of you, it's all about having an experienced musher. Although the scenery was stunning, the mode of travel is an acquired taste and can be a bit dangerous. While dressing up in sealskin is a fun fashion statement, I would only recommend this activity for the brave at heart.

One of the most spectacular parts of the trip was our cruise into Disko Bay. Our small fishing boat navigated its way into a field of enormous icebergs, some as tall as skyscrapers. Disko Bay is supposedly where the iceberg that sank the Titanic originated, and seeing some of these giants towering above us it's easy to believe.

Greenland dining is expensive, but for the adventurous connoisseur it offers unusual and delicious gourmet fare. At Restaurant Mamartut, the chef himself served melt-in-your-mouth creations of cod garnished with wild mushroom mousse, reindeer pate, seal suaasat, and smoked fin whale carpaccio. The restaurant menu also showcased the quirky humor we saw among snowbound Greenlanders. A description of Chicken S-t Chardonnay read: "This wine is a tribute to the pearl hens at the Frankland Estate. Slightly nervous, cowardish poultry, which indirectly helps to create a wonderful beverage by eating pests and creating fertilizer."

After an action-packed trip, doing everything we had hoped, we were snowed in on our last day. Our flight back to Reykjavik was canceled and we had to spend another night in Ilulissat, which ended up being the best luck of all. But that's another story...
